Heard it all? Not until you hear the definition of a quality restaurant

Ever wonder what the definition of a quality restaurant is? Look no further than the Clark Regional Wastewater District to find out.

The district, in an effort to entice "quality restaurants" to the Hazel Dell, Felida Salmon Creek area, has adopted a new customer class for quality restaurants.

A quality restaurant, according to the wastewater district, would be a full-service eatery with turnover rates of one hour or more. They generally require reservations and aren't open for breakfast. While some do offer lunch, all serve dinner and seat at least 150 people.

The district is offering a 31 percent reduction in sewer connection charges and lower cost services than to other restaurants.
